

of Changabang from the Bagini pass, its cliffs, draped with fresh snow, standing out against a background of dark sky, was perhaps the most successful. Camp scenes and a few fascinating glimpses of the lower region broke the monotony of rock and snow, of horrid precipices and smutty icefalls.

- Dr Rigby crossed the Mont Cenis, visited Chamonix and crossed the Col de Balme. The following is interesting for the modern quality of its description;—

Yevay, August 17, 1789. . . . We reached Salenche at 3 o'clock (on Thursday the 18th), a town situated in a picturesque valley surrounded by mountains, Mont Blanc being distinguished among them like a giant among tall men. The cloudy, rainy weather that had prevailed for the last few days had totally hidden the snowy summit of this extraordinary mountain, to the disappointment of the multitudes who had assembled at Salenche to behold it; and we had met two Englishmen going to Geneva to wait till the weather should be clearer. But Mont Blanc was very civil to us. We had not been at Salenche a quarter of an hour before he uncovered his majestic head. Tremendous sight! The way in which the journey is usually continued is on mules or in chars à bancs, which are the carriages of the country, but there was so much company at Salenche that everything was engaged. Here, therefore, our difficulties began, if such they would be called to persons who went laughing all the way. There was nothing to be done but to foot it all the way to Chamouny: this was 18 miles off, and it was now four o'clock in the afternoon. But we took courage, and began our march, taking with us two cheerful guides, to show the way and carry our luggage. . . . The mountain showers here are not the gentle, soft-descending showers of England, but are produced by big and heavy clouds fully charged with water, which seem to let it go the instant they touch the tops or sides of these mountains. In this condition we trudged up several high hills whose rough and broken surfaces were not only unpleasant to the feet, but in some degree dangerous; more especially as we had occasionally to pass through torrents which at this time were much increased in volume. . . . We stopped about seven o'clock at a home among the rocks near there, where we got some refreshments, and I put on a dry shirt and waistcoat. We here saw curious models of the glaciers which they urged us to buy, and certainly they were more interesting and probably more correct than any maps or plans of such a peculiar country could be. It was dark long before we reached Chamouny, and as we approached it we were met by two women who offered themselves as guides, and told us that no beds were to be had at either of the inns. We were much pleased with one of them, and engaged them both. They conducted us to the inn where we supped, and then passed a rather uncomfortable night in a Savoyard cottage. The next morning we were ready to ascend another hill. Mont Blanc was immediately before us, the sun shone bright and the atmosphere was clear. The various accounts which I had heard of the glaciers represented a visit to them as full of difficulties and dangers, but, believe me, both are such only as a very moderate degree of perseverance and care will overcome. We set off each of us with a long staff, like so many Foresters. We had been so well trained to the practice of climbing mountains that we were less fatigued with scrambling up to the Montagne verte, which is the way to the first glacier, than we had expected. We were indeed three hours in ascending, and were frequently obliged to repose ourselves on pieces of rock, or broken trees, but even at such times we were well rewarded for our labour by the delightful prospect before us. . . . A miserable little hut, which is the residence of two hideous Savoyard women who have the care of the cows, afforded us a refreshing draught of excellent milk. Within two or three hundred yards of this spot we came to the edge of a steep declivity which opened to our view the extraordinary valley of ice which was the object of our visit. . . . As several parties had ascended before us, the scene was rendered still more picturesque by different groups scattered about, some walking on the ice, some scrambling up the hill, and some lying down on the sunny bank of the Green Mountain, refreshing themselves with provisions they had brought with them. We soon found our way to the ice, the surface of which is much undulated, and in several places with deep fissures, through which streams of water are continually running. . . . What a wonderful and magnificent thing! An immense valley of solid ice, surrounded by stupendous mountains with their summits covered with snow. Not unaptly is it called La Mer de Glace, from its extent and its undulated surface. We walked some way upon it. It is not clear, slippery ice, like that produced by the freezing of large surfaces of water, but has evidently been all originally snow, the surface of which - has been partially melted, and then frozen again. . . . From seven in the morning to five in the afternoon was thus employed in our visit to the glacier, and we found on our return that we had walked less than twenty miles.

- On his return to Geneva Dr. Rigby 'saw many ladies well painted and fashionably dressed' to make up for the 'two hideous Savoyard women.'
