A useful account of the various passes with diagrams of the slopes, with heights in metres and also in feet. A uniform scale of miles for hill and level on a diagram does not indicate the actual distance on a zig-zag road with a slope of 1 in 10, but it is difficult if not impossible to make a diagram represent all facts.

- A most excellent work as far as it goes, for its very numerous illustrations from the earliest painters to those of the present day. These are devoted too exclusively to German painters. The Italians get fair justice, but the French get too little (Loppé is not mentioned) and the English are much overlooked, as Coleman, Williams and McCormick do not occur. However, the book is a valuable contribution and most interesting.

- Avalanche statistics in Switzerland began in 1872. 9368 have been recorded and are tabulated in this volume according to river basins. Though the Rhone district is larger than the Rhine district, the latter had 2320 avalanches to 1365 in the former. Two-thirds of the avalanches start between 5000 ft. and 8000 ft. Full descriptions of the important falls of recent years are given and the volume has very fine plates.

- Pfarrer J. S. Wytttenbach was towards the end of the eighteenth century the centre of attraction in Bern for the many distinguished travellers who visited the Alps and we have here many interesting letters on the Alps to and from him hitherto unpublished. Those from Count v. Gersdorf, which were sent from Görlitz to the Bern library for Dr. Dübi's examination, are the chief treasures in this paper, and the further promised publication of the Count's letters with reference to the first ascent of Mont Blanc (the Count was in Chamonix at the time) will be looked forward to with great interest. Bourrit who appeared to have retained money that the Count handed him for Balmat comes off badly at the hands of Wytttenbach, to whom the Count appealed—'Dass Bourrit eine aufgeblasene Kröte, ein luftiger Narr, ein grosssprecherischer Prahlhans, ein schlechter Mensch sei, wissen alle die ihn kennen,' writes Wytttenbach. In his letter to Miss Craven, Bourrit however says the money was paid over.

The two theories of valley formation in glacier regions are (1) glacier erosion and (2) river erosion, in which the presence of glaciers is preservative. Herr Gogarten holds that glaciers erode very little, but influence the form of valleys by removal of rocks and stones. With regard to the origin of lakes bordering the Alps there are (1) the glacier erosion theory of Penck and (2) the depression theory of Heim, who considers that the whole mass of the Alps has sunk, so that the border valleys have become lakes. This latter theory receives support from the numerous terraces noticed by Baltzer and others on the Lakes of Como, Garda and Zurich. Penck denies that those terraces are remains of ancient valleys and does not consider that they prove the sinking of the Alps. He maintains that if the Lake of Como owed its origin to this cause, the side valleys would have sunk at the same time and become branches of the lake. (This has occurred with the Lake of Lucerne.) With regard to the Lake of Zurich, Ramsay viewed it as produced by glacial erosion, while Lyell held it to be caused by the sinking of the Alps. Rothpletz, who was the first specially to study the lake, at first considered it to be a fault-fissure but later abandoned that theory. Heim noticed the sloping terraces and based on them his theory of the sinking of the Alps. Herr Gogarten from personal investigation agrees with Heim and considers his theory proved by the sloping terraces of Horgen and Wadeswill. The age of the dislocation is quaternary, between the two glacial periods 'Deckenschotter' and 'Riseis.' The 'Deckenschotter' shows sloping declivities with other accumulations undisturbed. Bruckner, on the other hand, maintains that the Lake of Zurich shows no signs of being a drowned valley, as the lateral valleys are hanging valleys, proving the deepening of the main valley by glacier ice. Bruckner also considers the Lintthal to have been deepened by glacier action: but Herr Gogarten, having studied the numerous terraces of the valley, does not agree with this view. He also gives the various theories on the formation of those terraces, but does not consider that any of them gives a satisfactory explanation as to why the older valley floors are wider than the more recent. This point has still to be worked out. He agrees however with the opinion of Heim and Bodmer that the terraces which form parallel systems with the sloping sides, and are carried on from the main valley into the side valleys, are remains of valleys that have been formed by flowing water.

Mrs. Gordon describes a series of thrust-masses composed of Permian, Triassic, Jurassic and cretaceous rocks that have travelled from east to west above the older crystalline rocks of the central Alps and have subsequently been down-thrown along with the older rocks and suffered further deformation in the Dolomites region. Such masses as the Langkofl and Plattkofl are areas of inthrow surrounded by faults, within which the higher thrust-slices have been preserved. This has been regarded as the 'coral reef' of Middle Triassic age, but the supposed reef peculiarities are interpreted by Mrs. Gordon upon the basis of the overthrust structures typical of the whole area.

IN MEMORIAM.

A. J. BUTLER.

As one of the older members of the Club (he was elected in 1886), as Editor of the ALPINE JOURNAL (1890-1893), as an ardent lover of the Alps, and as a scholar and writer of distinction, Arthur John Butler deserves special notice in this Review. He was the eldest son of William John Butler, well-known as vicar of Wantage, founder and warden of the Wantage sisterhood, and subsequently Dean of Lincoln. Austere but kindly, the Dean did not flinch from speaking the truth, even if it wounded the hearer. Outspoken on all occasions, he was merciful except to self-indulgence. These characteristics descended to his son, together with a remarkable share of both mental and physical activity. Born in 1844, A. J. Butler was educated at Bradfield, Eton, and Trinity (Cambridge). At Cambridge he won a Bell Scholarship in 1864, and three years later graduated with a first class in Classics, and a third in the Mathematical Tripos. Shortly afterwards he became a Fellow of Trinity; and he retained a great affection for his college all his life.

In 1870 he entered the Education Department, but left it in 1887 for a place as salaried partner in the publishing business of Messrs. Rivingtons. In 1890 Messrs. Longmans took over the business, and employed Butler, during the remainder of his five years' agreement, in various ways. In 1892 he joined Cassells as their
