

nature there would well up occasionally a flood of irrepressible fun. Yet how depressed he could be at times by too prolonged a succession of easy days! Unless from time to time he had something worthy of himself to accomplish he was liable to become frankly bored. I remember his gentle sarcasm when, oppressed by the relentless bad weather of 1910, I took refuge in the Maritime Alps with his brother in search of the smaller easier climbs to be found there. Such climbs were not for him, and after taking a short spell of hunting in his own mountains he preferred to return to arduous though uncongenial work in Paris.

Everything he did was done with zest. During his last chamois hunting trip he must have performed prodigies. Letters appeared in the papers complaining that all the chamois in the country were being destroyed, and that too by one man.

Sometimes when I think of him my dominant memory is of a whole series of the hardest climbs carried out so skilfully and with so little apparent effort that one scarcely realised what formidable undertakings many of them were. His climbing seemed to come naturally, as if effortless. The only anxiety he ever showed was for his employer's safety and comfort. And that anxiety was constant. All his energy, the product of his indomitable spirit and splendid physique, was ever at his employer's disposal. Moreover he was a man of rigid integrity.

A fact may be cited as showing the esteem in which he was held. When bearers were required for the task of carrying the body over the Col d'Iseran to its last resting place at Bonneval-sur-Arc, practically all the able-bodied villagers volunteered at once. However, only sixteen of the strongest were chosen and these carried the coffin from the hillside above Val d'Isère to Bonneval in relays of eight at a time without pause in six hours. Such a task in most countries would scarcely be thought possible. It was only made so by the goodwill and solidarity of Auguste's own people of Bonneval. Though known very intimately to few, he was much beloved and respected. In the fitting words of his brother 'c'était un homme fier et juste.'
